HISTORIA

See Francisco de Goya y Lucientes, Painter.

It is not known why Goya discarded the copper from this unique proof, which was discovered in 1953 in the collection of Mariano Ballester.

ANÁLISIS ARTÍSTICO

Once he had made the preparatory drawing, he transferred it to copper, going over the contours with drypoint, although in the end he decided to engrave it only with five-tone aquatint. With the varnish reserves, he outlined the forms of the victim, the platform on which he was standing and the inquisitor. With the burnisher he softens the outline of the inquisitor and his companion and applies it to the latter's tonsure and the people in the foreground. It is possible that, once the aquatint work was finished, Goya thought it appropriate to make some nuances by resorting to etching, which can be seen in some of the long lines of the victim's dark skirt.

The result of this engraving must not have convinced the Aragonese painter, who rejected the plate and made a new one for Capricho no. 23 Those Dusts in the series.
